What is the conventional usage of this pattern? import com.my.package.; public class MyClass { public static final int ID = 1; public static void myMethod() { System.out.println(ID); } } vs. import com.my.package.; public class MyClass { public static void myMethod() { System.out.println(1); } } P.S. bad practice. A: Code formatting is also an important part of working with others, whether it's long-term co

What's New in the Adobe Photoshop CC 2018 Version 19?

In light of the numerous reports that have shown a continued existence of antibiotic-resistant bacteria in the ocean, a San Diego State University professor is developing a process that does not use antibiotics to treat the food that is served. Although it sounds counterintuitive, Dr. Renee Steiner, director of the Biosystems Engineering Research Center at the university, said that this actually may be a more effective approach. "Biosystems is an engineering-based, multifaceted program that explores new engineering ideas and develops new technologies for addressing ocean resources challenges," Steiner said. "We don't use antibiotics, which are poisons in the ocean, but at the same time, we're investigating other ways to kill bacteria that are harmful to the food chain and that could promote the growth of other microbes that are more beneficial to the fish." Previous experiments have shown that the addition of chlorine and copper to the water can kill a lot of the harmful bacteria. Steiner said that although this is effective, it also kills much of the healthy bacteria. She added that it is extremely difficult to monitor the results of this method since not many people would have the skills necessary to test it out. "What the public would notice is if you're eating fish and they just don't taste good.

And maybe you don't even realize you're eating a contaminated fish," Steiner said. "But now you're eating a piece of fish that doesn't taste good. So, it may be one thing and may be the other thing. It depends on the concentration of the bacteria, if they are harmful or not." Although she said that the process could be improved, Steiner said that she is hopeful that the public will be willing to give this technology a try. "We need to have sufficient amounts of food, but that doesn't mean we should sacrifice the public's quality of food and life," she said. "We should move in the direction that's good for everybody, because we're all in it together." While the process is still in its developmental stages, Steiner said that there are quite a few advantages. With non-toxic materials, the end product will actually be able to be sold, she explained. The process is also less wasteful and allows the food to be preserved, potentially for longer.. 3. Cognitive Performance.
